WILL BILL LEARN-ED THE DETAILS LATER, AFTER DAWES AND HIS MEN WERE LOCKED UP...

Alexander Majors spent seventy years on the Frontier of a growing America. He counted among his many friends, Indian scouts, ranchers, cowboys, the redskins themselves, miners, and trappers. Buffalo Bill once said of Alexander Majors, "The man who could in face of all dangers and obstacles originate and carry to success a line of freighter wagons, a mail route from the Atlantic to the Pacific, was no ordinary individual."

So today we are going to visit a very old man who sits on a rocker and gazes over the vast lands he still owns. His voice is a bit feeble but his mind and eyes are clear. He is going to tell us about a silver expedition.

"In the summer of 1827 my father, Benjamin Majors, with twenty-four other men formed a party to go to the Rocky Mountains in search of a silver mine. It had been discovered by James Cockrell while on a beaver trapper expedition some four years previous.

At that time, men attempting to cross the plains had no means of carrying food supplies to last more than a week or ten days at the most. When their scanty supply of provisions was exhausted they depended solely upon the game they might chance to kill, and they generally had to eat it without salt.

These twenty-five men elected James Cockrell as their captain. He was the only man of the party who had crossed the plains. Being the discoverer of what he claimed was a rich silver mine, they relied solely upon him to pilot them to the spot.

The only facilities for transportation were one horse each. Their scant amount of bedding, with the rider, was all the horse could carry. Each man had to be armed with a good gun, and powder and ball enough to last him during the entire trip, for the territory through which they had to pass was inhabited by hostile Indians. No cooking vessels were taken with them. They depended entirely upon roasting or broiling their meat upon a fire.

When they could not find deer, antelope, elk, or buffalo, they had to do without food unless they were driven to kill and eat a wolf they might chance to get. When they reached the buffalo belt, 200 miles farther west, there was no scarcity of meat. The country where they roamed was 400 miles across, reaching to the base of the Rocky Mountains, and extending from Texas more than 3,000 miles, very far north of the Canadian line. The buffalo were numbered by the millions. It often occurred in travelling through this district that there would be days together when one would never be out of sight of great herds of these animals.

They stayed in the most open portion of the plains they could find. The grass called buffalo grass did not grow more than one and one-half to two inches high. There were millions of acres of this grass. The buffalo's teeth and under jaw were so arranged by nature that he could bite this short grass to the earth.

The party soon reached the Raton Mountains. At this point they found innumerable herds of buffalo, and there was water in plenty. They followed the margin of the river until they reached the foothills of the Rocky Mountains. Then their captain told them he was in the region where he had discovered the mine. He found some difficulty in locating the spot. After many days spent in searching, some of the party grew restless and distrustful. They doubted as to whether he ever discovered silver ore. Or if so, that he was unwilling to show them the location. Some finally became very threatening in their attitude toward him.

He at last found what he and they had supposed was silver ore. They were disappointed however when they found nothing but dirty looking rock with a few bright specks of metal in it. Not one of them had ever seen silver ore. Nor did they know what to do to get the silver from the ore. Many of them expected to find the silver in metallic form. They thought they could cut it out with their knives. Then pack home a good portion of it upon their horses. It must be remembered that this was the first prospecting party to look for silver that ever left the western borders of Missouri for the Rocky Mountains.

After finding what they supposed was a silver mine, each one selected some of the best specimens. Then they left for home. Everything moved along well with them until they arrived at about the point on the Arkansas River where Dodge City later was to be built.

They camped one evening at the close of a day's travel. After eating a hearty supper of buffalo meat, they put their guard around their horses and went to bed. Two men at a time guarded the horses, making a change every three hours during the night.

This precaution was necessary to keep the Indians, who were in great numbers and hostile, from running off their horses. But on that fatal night the Indians succeeded in crawling on their bellies where the grass was tall enough to conceal them from the guards. It was only along the river bottoms and water courses that grass grew tall. When they got between the guard and the horses they suddenly rose. They fired their guns, shook buffalo robes, and with war-whoops and yells succeeded in frightening the horses. Then the Indians who were in reserve mounted on ponies, ran the horses off. Part of the Indians, at the same time, turned their guns upon the men that were lying upon the bank of the river.

They jumped out of their beds, over the bank, and into the water knee-deep. The men by stooping under the bank, which was four feet perpendicular, were protected from the arrows and bullets of the enemy. There they stood for the remainder of that cold October night.

One of the party, by name of Mark Foster, when they jumped over the bank, did not stop. He ran as fast as he could go for the other side. The water was shallow. He fell several times. Each time it drew a yell from the Indians who thought they had killed him. For they shot at him as he ran. He got to the other side and was thoroughly drenched. His gun, which was a flint lock and muzzle-loader was entirely useless. He remained there shivering with cold the entire night. When daylight appeared, he started to cross the river to the camp to find out whether his comrades were dead or alive. He called and when my father answered his call, he asked if they would allow him to join them. After holding a consultation it was agreed he might come. He walked firmly up to them and remarked:

"I have something to say to you, gentlemen. It is this. I know you think I acted like a coward and I do not blame you under the circumstances. When you all jumped over the bank I thought you were going to run to the other side. I did not know any better until I had got so far out I was in greater danger to return than to go ahead. For as you know, the Indians were sending a volley of bullets and arrows after me. They really thought they had killed me every time I fell. Now, there is one of two things you must do.

The first is that you turn me over to the right authorities. Or if you do not comply with this, that every one of you agree upon your sacred honor that you will never allude to what happened last night. Now, I have presented the situation fairly and you must accept one or the other before you leave this spot."

They all agreed never to allude to it in any way in his presence. They treated him as one of them from that time on for he was a brave man after all. One can readily see that he was a man of very great courage and physical endurance, or he could not have survived the pressure upon him. And now they had to WALK home!

They went to work and burned their saddles, bridles, and blankets. In fact they burned everything they could not carry with them on their backs. This they did to prevent the Indians from getting any more "booty." They traveled at the rate of twenty-five miles per day. They could have gone farther but for the fact that they had no trail to walk in. The grass in some places and the drifting sand in others made it exceedingly irksome for footmen.

My father was frequently asked after his return:

"Was there no road you could follow?"

He would answer:

"No, from the fact that the drifting sand soon filled every track of a passing caravan and no trace was left of a trail a few hours afterward."

They finally all returned safely home, after losing a lot of weight. Some sent their specimens to St. Louis to be tested for silver. The reports were discouraging. For all they didn't gain — they could have remained at home. But they did gain one thing — a mutual bond as a result of their experiences that held them all together."
